

This podcast series for teachers provides inspiration in how historians themselves teach with primary documents effectively in the classroom. Listen to the historians themselves talk about various time periods pertaining to the essays they wrote about and how they personally use primary documents in the classroom to illuminate key ideals espoused during those times. In addition, hear a curriculum specialist discuss how Preserving American Freedom can be instrumental in meeting the new Common Core Standards.

This series was created by Alexandra Rospond, a University of the Arts Museum Education Graduate student and Education Intern at the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.
